the essence of a vessel is its emptiness. A city, in a sense, is a vessel, too—a container for people and for life. A city's essence, like a vessel's, also lies in its voids—its public spaces.

Most of us think of a city as a group of buildings. Yet we know from personal experience that the real flavor of a city comes from its spaces—its streets, squares, rivers, and parks. We notice that the quality of life pursued in any place has much to do with its design. Poorly designed spaces inhibit life and movement.

Well-designed ones raise the ordinary rituals of life to a high level of intensity and purpose. The conclusion seems to be that a city, so far from being a cluster of buildings, is actually a sequence of spaces enclosed and defined by buildings. The thought may seem strange; yet it is, in fact, the very essence of urban design.
